Description

An 18th century Georgian cut lead glass celery vase, circa 1790.

Celery vases are decorative glass or ceramic vessels popular in the late 18th to early 20th centuries, designed to display celery stalks-a symbol of wealth and refinement at the time. Typically featuring elegant, fluted edges or intricate patterns, they often graced formal dining tables during meals.

Their transparent or ornate designs highlighted the vibrant green of celery, a luxury item then. Today, celery vases are cherished antiques, admired for their historical significance and aesthetic appeal.
